

INTRODUCING A NEW CAT INTO A HOUSEHOLD WITH AN ALREADY EXISTING CAT

When introducing a new cat, initially isolate the new cat in a separate room with its own food, water, litter box and toys. This allows each cat to gradually adjust to the scent and sounds of the other cat. If a veterinarian has deemed both cats healthy, and free of disease, limited interaction may occur under the door.

Continue the gradual introduction by exchanging bedding between the cats, and rubbing a cloth around one cat's mouth and leaving that cloth in the other cat's space, or rubbing a cloth alternately on each cat. As cats start to exhibit curiosity about each other, reward friendly behaviour with treats and praise.

At this point, short, supervised, direct interactions may begin. For the initial exposure, have one cat in a carrier and allowing the other cat to approach. Feeding both cats at the same time can reduce stress also. Following this, allow cats to walk around and sniff each other. Continue to reward friendly behaviour. Gradually increase the supervised time together.

Do not leave the cats together unsupervised until several supervised interactions without aggression have occurred. The process of introducing a new cat may take several weeks. Older cats may need a quiet space from kittens for an extended period of time. Friendly, well-socialized cats may adapt to each other rapidly.

Pheromone products, available at your veterinarian's office, may ease the introduction. However, pheromones should be used in conjunction with gradual introduction.

(The above information is from the American Association of Feline Practitioners)